

Truth For The World

Is This Your Big Opportunity?

You may have heard that the word for “crisis” in Japanese is written with the words “danger” and “opportunity.” While a crisis is a dangerous time, it can also present opportunities.

Truth For The World is not in a crisis, but it is in a time of transition. That brings to mind another saying which is “the only thing constant is change.”

One transition relates to roles. As of January 1st, Kendal Rasnake has taken over the directorial decision making. All the staff from last year are still continuing, there has merely been a shifting in some responsibility.

Another change is that we are seeking a congregation for oversight. The Bethel Springs Church of Christ in Bethel Springs, Tennessee is still working with us as of now, but they have let us know that due to changes in the congregation they are planning to remove themselves from overseeing us in the middle of this year.

Is God opening up a door for your congregation to be involved in global evangelism by working with Truth For The World?

Working with the Bethel Springs congregation has been great and we thank them for their support these past few years. We also thank them for supporting us and working with us for a bit longer as we transition.

There is more than one way to look at a crisis, a transition, or even an approach for help. Congregations that are approached for help by evangelists, missionaries, and/or other congregations can look at it two ways: 1) a crisis, or annoyance, or 2) an opportunity.

My question to you is, “How do you view an opportunity to help an evangelist, missionary, or an organization like Truth For The World? Is it an annoyance or an opportunity?”

Perhaps some congregation reading this is starting to ask themselves, “Is God opening up a door for our congregation to be involved in global evangelism by working with Truth For The World?” If you are thinking this, get in contact with us. Let’s see if we might do even more together for Christ than we could do apart. (office@tftw.org)
